Speed Limits Change

Maximum speed limits will be raised shortly to 70 mph for cars and 60 mph for trucks on most of Virginia's interstate highway system, but will remain at present levels for 12 urban sections because of safety considerations.

J. P. Mills, Jr., traffic and safety engineer for the State Department of Highways, said today that the department's sign crews will begin erecting new speed limit signs July 1 and hope to have the job completed the next day.

Nearly 400 signs informing motorists of the present limits of 65 mph for cars and 55 mph for trucks will be changed, Mills said.

The 1972 session of the General Assembly authorized the increased limits, but provided for lower speeds at specific locations if traffic engineering studies indicated the lower limits were desirable for safety reasons.

Mills said the department's traffic engineers have driven over the entire interstate system -- some 815 miles of which will be open to motorists by July 1, with the June 29 opening of Interstate 77 between Wytheville and Bland.

The engineers found that a total of about 64 miles should retain present maximum speed limits, generally because they are located in urban areas and serve heavy volumes of traffic, or, in a few instances, because it was concluded that increased speed limits would not be safe due to curves or because of the short lengths of the roads involved.

Among those to be unchanged is the full 22-mile Virginia portion of Interstate 495, the beltway around Washington, D. C., where the existing limits of 55 mph for cars and 55 mph for trucks will be retained. The beltway, one of the state's busiest roads, serves more than 80,000 vehicles a day on some segments.

Present limits of 65 mph and 55 mph also will be kept on the 12-mile segment of Interstate 95 (the Shirley Highway) from a point a mile south of Springfield at Secondary 644 to the Virginia-District of Columbia line. This serves traffic volumes ranging up to 106, 900 vehicles daily. (Reduced construction speed limits are in effect temporarily on much of this section.)

The existing limits also will be retained on two other sections of highway in Northern Virginia. One is the half-mile segment of I-66 from Lynn St. to the District of Columbia line in Arlington; the other is a 3.4 mile section of I-66 west of Manassas in Fauquier County.

Also included on the list for retention of present speed limits are two segments of interstate routes in the Richmond area. These include the 3.4-mile segment of I-64 between the Richmond-Petersburg Turnpike downtown and a point just east of Va. 33, and a 1.7 mile section of I-95 connecting with the northern end of the Richmond- Petersburg Turnpike.

Earlier, the turnpike authority announced plans to retain existing speed limits on the entire distance of its facility.

The existing maximum limits will be retained on five sections of the interstate system in the Hampton Roads area. These include the 8.4 miles of I-64 between Newgate Road and the Curlew Drive overpass in Virginia Beach; 4.5 miles of I-264 connection with I-64 and the Virginia Beach -Norfolk Expressway; a 2.1 mile section of I-264 between US 17 and Washington Street in Portsmouth; the 1.5 miles of I-464 which have been completed; and the 2.8 miles of I-64 between Va. 134 and the Hampton Roads Bridge - Tunnel toll plaza in Hampton.

In addition, the present limits will be kept on the 1.5 mile Interstate 381 spur at Bristol.
